Course Overview:

This seminar explores the history of right-wing political thought from the late eighteenth century to the present, with an emphasis on the core ideas and beliefs that animate contemporary right-wing political movements. This course seeks to answer the questions: what constitutes the Right? What are the central principles and values of those groups associated with this designation? And what are the defining features of what is commonly referred to as the “Global Right?” It will do so by examining primary tracts written by theologians, political philosophers, and social theorists as well as secondary literature written by scholars interrogating various movements and ideologies associated with the Right in America, Europe, the Middle East, and Asia. Though touching on specific national political parties, institutions, and think tanks, its focus will be on mapping the intellectual similarities and differences between various right-wing ideologies. The “Right” emerged alongside its counterpoint, the “Left,” as early as 1692 to describe the congregation patterns surrounding the French Monarch, but it was not until the Revolution of 1789 when it gained its current political meaning. As the French Chamber of Deputies debated the rights of man and royal veto powers it was suggested that opponents to these measures sit du côté droit, while supporters place themselves du côté gauche. The division, many complained, was too absolute and left no room for nuance or political idiosyncrasies. Yet the arrangement held, the terms stuck, and by mid-century the right had begun to be a catchall for a host of political groups, including conservatives, traditionalists, authoritarians, royalists, nationalists and papists. By the twentieth century the term would be stretched to include movements ranging from Fascism to Populism and would be used to describe the political position of political parties in the Middle East and Asia. Though primarily associated with European and parliamentary politics, increasingly the designation of the right has been applied to Evangelical and Judeo-Christian groups in the United States.

Course Format The primary form of instruction will be seminar discussions. Students should be prepared to come to class having finished all readings assigned for that week listed on the syllabus. Some readings may be included on the syllabus during the semester to address outstanding questions that arise in the context of classroom conversations. All registered students will lead classroom conversation and provide an overview of the syllabus readings at least one time during the semester. Every student must meet with the instructor during the semester to review course readings and prepare for their role as seminar leader. All syllabus readings will be provided online
